As a musically voracious teenager in the ’70s with a strong interest in my faith, I read everything I could find published by the church on music. However, the general tenor of most of it bothered me, condemning as it did entire genres of music as evil - insidiously inflicting spiritual, moral and even physical harm on all who dared listen. In 1983, as a capstone project for the Honors program at Walla Walla College, I wrote a paper titled "A History of Appropriateness in Protestant Church Music." What I discovered was that controversy over church music has been brewing, and in many cases boiling over, for hundreds of years. The project gave me an even greater sense that music’s reputation had been unjustly besmirched by many church writers, and left me with an abiding interest in books on music, the mind and spirit.

Hence, I was eager to read Lilianne Doukhan’s new book – In Tune With God. I was delighted to find the book impeccably researched, carefully thought out, and clearly and convincingly written. While the entire book has much to recommend it, I’d like to focus on Doukhan’s efforts to restore music’s good name.

A cardinal argument made by earlier writers is that certain rhythms, chords, as well as entire genres of popular music are at best “damaged goods” and more likely simply evil. This notion always struck me as somehow Gnostic in its equating a part of the created order with evil. During the Middle Ages, the Church adamantly denounced the interval of the tritone (three whole steps) as diabolus en musica – the Devil in music - and forbade its use. With time, this prohibition faded, and today every hymn on every page of every Christian hymnal contains tritones. In spite of many similar prohibitions that have eventually wilted, commentators have continued to rail against the “evils” of various instruments and styles. Doukhan incisively traces this objection back to the Greek doctrine of “ethos” and the Platonic view of the spiritual world as the only true reality. Music was held to be a sign of this spiritual reality, and was therefore able to effect spiritual and emotional changes in listeners. Musical scales felt to upset listeners’ emotional equilibrium were banned by the Greeks (pp. 47-52).

Doukhan contrasts this philosophy with the Biblical perspective: the power to transform lives belongs not to created objects or elements, but only to the Holy Spirit (p. 53). Unlike the Greeks who conceived of good and evil as residing in concepts such as harmony and dissonance, Bible writers describe good and evil as obedience or disobedience to the law of God (p. 54). Doukhan quotes Jesus’ statement in Mark 7:15 here: “Nothing outside a man can make him ‘unclean’ by going into him. Rather, it is what comes out of a man that makes him ‘unclean.’” When it comes to music though, as Doukhan details, church leaders – right down to our own day – have tended to side with Plato and Aristotle rather than Jesus and Paul.

So is Doukhan saying that music is neutral, completely powerless? Certainly not. “The real power of music lies in its ability to transform a given situation, namely, to intensify, to beautify, to stimulate, to create associations, and to build community” (p. 62). In my experience, and Doukhan’s as well, I’m guessing, it is the associative phenomenon that is most powerful in shaping human response to music. We all have specific associations with individual pieces of music: for me, Day is Dying in the West will forever conjure up vivid images of Sabbath vespers in the Walla Walla College Church, while A Bicycle Built for Two reminds me of my son as a three-year old (he learned to sing it at daycare!). Many of us have shared associations: Elgar’s “Pomp and Circumstance” March No. 1 reminds us of countless graduations, while Tchaikovsky’s 1812 Overture evokes Fourth of July fireworks. Entire styles of music have been linked in this fashion to various activities: for many in my grandparents’ and parents’ generations, jazz was and always will be music of bars and brothels, and therefore unacceptable for Christian enjoyment. For nearly all of my students, though, it’s just another style to be explored and enjoyed. All of us, however, must recognize that these associations, while personally intense, are probably intensely personal – your mileage may vary. In addition, even widely-held communal associations may change over time, as the circumstances previously linked with a piece or a style change. With concerted effort, associations may even be deliberately changed. Because of these factors, all of us must think and act charitably toward those with different associative constructs than our own. Doukhan aptly cites 1 Corinthians 8 in this connection, suggesting that substituting music-related terms for food-related terms will help us see the relevant application (pp. 122,123).

Having established that music (or any of its constituent elements) has no inherent moral qualities, but can be marshaled to reinforce either good or evil, Doukhan cites the varied efforts of church leaders through the ages to advance the gospel through music. She finds the most positive, energetic example in the ministry of Martin Luther. Luther used music for evangelism, worship and community building through his many chorales. Based almost entirely on pre-existing musical materials (only three out of over 170 are original in both tune and text), Luther’s chorales are predominantly upbeat, rhythmic and joyous, with over 25% containing syncopation (p. 174). According to Doukhan, Luther had no concept of sacred or secular music – all music was potentially useful in spreading the gospel (p. 181,182). While he retooled contemporary popular music for worship, he also vigorously held onto earlier church music, wanting to maintain connection with the church of the past.

In the final section of the book, Doukhan addresses the current state of church music, and offers helpful suggestions for churches wishing to maintain (or regain) a vibrant musical ministry. While much of the book lays the groundwork for accepting contemporary popular styles within the worship service, Doukhan is clear that she – like Luther – sees tremendous value in retaining traditional styles, as well. Her experience resonates with my own that while students enjoy and are blessed by contemporary worship music, they do not want traditional music to be excluded. Too often, those in charge of planning services, in a desire to be relevant, focus exclusively on contemporary styles. However, in their quest to break free from the “monotony” of traditional church music, they simply substitute one monotony for another. A blended service will meet the eclectic tastes of most youth, and give many older members opportunities to be gracious.

Doukhan does mention several challenges in utilizing contemporary worship music: frequent lack of musical training, amateurish technological support, the ease of slipping into entertainment mode, the possibility of emotional manipulation, and keeping one’s attitude and ego in check. She also discusses the challenge of finding pieces that are “truthful” – lyrics that not only have “theological correctness, but [also] depth, meaningfulness, directness, and poetic quality” and music that is “well articulated, flowing freely, and able to carry a message clearly” (pp. 227, 229). The discrimination to make this kind of choice is often in short supply, but is vital if church music of any style is to be truly meaningful. This sifting must be done whenever one deals with new music – there’s far more junk than gems out there. For this reason in part, contemporary worship music often pales drastically in comparison with established hymns. The hymnal is a collection of the gems – pieces that have stood the test of time. There have undoubtedly been hundreds of hymns every bit as hackneyed as that praise chorus you can’t stand, but thankfully they’ve been swept up in history’s dustbin. It will take years for a serious repertory of “contemporary” worship music to be amassed, and by that time, there will a new genre pressing for inclusion.

In Tune With God is a must-read for those even remotely involved in planning or presenting worship services, and for anyone wishing to learn more about the sometimes turbulent saga of church music. We all owe Lilianne Doukhan a debt of gratitude.

Ken Parsons
Associate Professor
School of Music
Southern Adventist University
Collegedale, TN 37315